Why do managers need to effectively coach employees?

- The rapidly changing economy demands that new-hires immediately add value to the workplace without long training and onboarding programs.
- Creativity, innovation and the ability to take positive risks are critical for participating in the changing global labor market.
- Disruptive business models and competition from across the globe require adaptability, flexibility and agility of today's employees.
- The diverse workforce requires awareness and the capacity to work across age, race and cultural divides.

Experience how coaching promotes the reflection, motivation, and accountability employees need to survive and thrive professionally.

For thirteen years, LifeBound has been providing cutting edge professional development around the world for business managers and educators.

Maureen Breeze trains and certifies business managers, college faculty and administrators, K12 educators, tutors, advisors and parents in academic coaching skills. She's been a featured speaker at many international and national conferences on the topics of coaching, leadership, and critical and creative thinking including the International Thinking Conference in Bilbao, Spain, the ECIS Conference in Hamburg, Germany, the Tri-Association Conference in Monterrey, Mexico, the National Association of Developmental Educators in Washington D.C, and the Schools of the Future Conference in Honolulu, HI. Maureen works with businesses and universities to implement coaching initiative that meet the needs of diverse, first generation, rural, and low-income populations. She co-authored Critical and Creative Thinking for Teenagers and Leadership for Teenagers, and developed curricula for a series of student success books. Maureen is both a LifeBound certified master coach and an International Coaching Federation certified coach. She graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Claremont McKenna College with a major in International Economics and minor in Mathematics.
